Introduction

Since the very earliest days of motion pictures, the Monterey Peninsula, along with much of Monterey County, has been a popular place for location shooting. More than 180 movies have been shot, at least in part, in this area. Some films may contain just a few seconds of footage, while others use the area for the entire feature. Aside from the obvious amusement factor, these films offer rare glimpses into the past of our community.

The core list of films provided here was originally compiled in the 1980s by Joe Graziano of the Monterey County Herald, who wrote the Professor Toro column for many years. With help from his "Constant Readers" he was able to track down this vital information. We are most grateful for his efforts. I have added to the list movies made since that time. I have also removed four movies from the list after watching them and realizing that they were not actually filmed here. See my notes in the appendix for details.

The original list was mostly limited to theatrical motion pictures, and does not include "made for TV movies," which were not considered real movies in their day, even though at least a few were shot here as well. The data provided here generally follows the original intent, but with the added recognition that motion picture distribution technology is evolving. So I have also included recent feature-length movies that had only limited theatrical exposure and were largely intended for the home video market. It only seems fair because the earliest movies on this list predate the invention of projectors and movie theaters. They were presented in amusement arcades on viewing machines called Kinetoscopes.

The list is presented here first in alphabetical order, then again in chronological order. Each list contains the titles (plus any alternate titles) and the year they were released. Subsequent pages provide detailed information about each movie including a brief plot description, information on local scenery, directors, stars, and technical information. I compiled the detailed information from a wide variety of sources, including the Monterey Herald, the Monterey County Film Commission, the Internet Movie Database, Leonard Maltin's Movie and Video Guide, and my own viewing of many of these films. As far as I know this is the most comprehensive and detailed guide to local movies that has ever been published.

A few of the films listed here also feature stars who live in the area, or did at one time. Clint Eastwood performed in and directed Play Misty for Me and The Eiger Sanction. Doris Day had the title role in Julie. Joan Fontaine played the leading ladies in Alfred Hitchcock's Rebecca and Suspicion, and Kim Novak did the same in Vertigo. A lesser known bit player named Edgar Kennedy of Monterey had a role in the 1927 film The Wrong Mr. Wright. He later went on to play small roles in some of the Marx Brothers films. These persons are listed in italics on the detail pages.

At the end of this document there is an appendix listing four movies that I removed from the list, a discussion of the kissing scene in From Here to Eternity, and a section of technical notes which you may find helpful for deciphering the technical portions of the detailed movie listings.

Big Sur

Story: Based on a true story about a period in the life of author Jack Kerouac. It begins with his retreat to a cabin in Big Sur to escape the media attention he gained from his novel On The Road. Boredom took him back to San Francisco where he faced serious emotional and relationship struggles. He and his friends made subsequent trips to the Big Sur cabin as he wrestled with depression while trying to understand his place in the world.

Scenery: Filmed almost entirely in Big Sur and San Francisco. Big Sur scenes include Garrapata Beach, Rocky Creek and Rocky Creek Bridge, Highway 1 between Hurricane Hill and Point Sur (in one of these scenes the narrator says they're driving south, but shows their car driving north), a cabin in a redwood forest, and miscellaneous coastal scenery.

The Forger

Alternate title: Carmel-By-The-Sea

Story: A teenage art prodigy is abandoned in Carmel by his mother. While struggling to survive, he meets an man who introduces him to the world of art forgery, forcing him to choose between artistic integrity and the prospect of wealth.

Scenery: Filmed entirely in Carmel and neighboring areas. Notable highlights include the Carmel Mission, Carmel Beach, an art gallery at Ocean Avenue and San Carlos, the workers cabins at the Odello Fields next to Highway 1 just south of the Carmel River, Sunset Center auditorium, and many other locations. There is also a brief shot of Colton Hall in Monterey.

People:

* Director: Laurence Roeck

* Stars: Josh Hutcherson, Hayden Panettiere, Alfred Molina, Lauren Bacall, Billy Boyd, Tricia Helfer, Dina Eastwood, Scott Eastwood.

Also of local interest: Director Laurence Roeck is a native of Carmel. Dina Eastwood has worked as a local TV news anchor at KSBW. A rough cut of the film was publicly screened at Carmel's Sunset Center auditorium, the same place where the movie's climax was filmed, on March 19, 2011. It was released direct to DVD on July 3, 2012.

The film makes three references to one of Carmel's original Bohemians, a writer named George Sterling. Sterling was largely responsible for creating Carmel's legendary Abalone Song, among other things. Sterling and some other members of the Bohemian Club had acquired small vials of cyanide. Sterling kept one with him at all times. He eventually used it to commit suicide in 1926. In the film, Joshua (Josh Hutcherson) finds a vial in a box along with a photo of Sterling in the studio of Anne-Marie (Lauren Bacall). The film briefly hints at the vial's contents as Joshua reads a book about local Bohemians. Knowing Sterling's real life and death story will add to the viewer's understanding of how the vial symbolically fits into the plot. Also, in Anne-Marie's studio is a photo of a nude man crouched on Carmel beach. That photo is also of George Sterling.

From Here to Eternity

Story: The lives military men and their women in Hawaii in the last few days before the bombing of Pearl Harbor. Parallel plot lines include a soldier who is abused by his commanding officer for refusing to join the company boxing team, and the commanding officer's wife has an affair with a sergeant.

Scenery: Undetermined. According to the Spring/Summer 2005 issue of Carmel Magazine, the famous beach kissing scene was originally filmed at Halona Cove on Oahu, Hawaii, but due to technical problems had to be re-shot. Rather than return to Hawaii, the cast and crew made a shorter trip to Pfeiffer Beach in Big Sur (other sources claim Garrapata beach). Anecdotal reports from old-timers indicate that Burt Lancaster, Deborah Kerr and an entire film crew were seen on the Big Sur beach for two days. That may very well have happened, but a careful examination of the scene clearly shows that the rock formations in the background match more recent videos of Halona Cove in Hawaii. Evidently, the Big Sur version either didn't make the final cut, or bits of it were interspersed with the Hawaiian footage. It is also possible that this is merely a local legend. See To Eternity, but not From Here in the appendix for further information.

Play Misty for Me

Story: Suspense thriller about a KRML jazz disc jockey stalked by a fan of Errol Garner's "Misty".

Scenery: Filmed entirely on the peninsula. The opening sequence shows Clint Eastwood driving up the coast from Big Sur to Carmel. KRML studio scenes were filmed at the station's original location in the Carmel Rancho Shopping Center (in the building closest to Carmel Valley Road). Brief scene of Jessica Walter having a key made outside Brinton's across the parking lot from KRML. Scenes also at the Sardine Factory on Cannery Row, a restaurant on Monterey's Municipal Wharf (now the Sandbar & Grill, before the deck was enclosed), on Ocean Avenue in Carmel and elsewhere. One scene was filmed at the Monterey Fairgrounds main arena during the Monterey Jazz Festival. Donna Mills's house was on Spindrift Road in the Carmel Highlands where the climax was filmed.

Also of local interest: This was the first movie directed by Clint Eastwood, who also lives in Carmel. Eastwood's production company, Malpaso Productions, was named after a canyon in the Carmel Highlands. In 1986 Eastwood was elected mayor of Carmel and served one two-year term.

KRML is an actual radio station in Carmel (1410 AM & 102.1 FM). Although it was depicted in the film as a jazz station, at the time of the filming it actually had an easy listening format. Later it was a Christian station. KRML eventually adopted a jazz format in the early 1980s which lasted for three decades before the format changed again in 2012.

Don Siegel, who directed many of Eastwood's earlier films, played the bartender at the Sardine Factory.

The Shift

Alternate Title: Ambition to Meaning: Finding Your Life's Purpose

Story: A docudrama relating to the teachings of Dr. Wayne Dyer. Three plotlines are threaded through the movie. One involves the everyday hassles of a family of four with the mother secretly desiring greater avenues for self-expression. Another involves a 30-something couple having trouble getting along because the husband is too focused on his work. The third involves Wayne Dyer himself, who is in the process of filming a documentary and dealing with the challenges his video crew is facing. They all converge at Asilomar Conference Center in Pacific Grove where their various dramas play out. Dyer's commentary during the "filmed" interviews ties the stories together.

Scenery: Filmed entirely on the Monterey Peninsula, mostly at the Asilomar Conference Center grounds in Pacific Grove. One brief scene includes the lower Alvarado Street Mall in downtown Monterey. Another was shot on a bench on the east side of Lake El Estero and there's another brief shot around the corner on Pearl Street in front of the cemetery. A restaurant scene was filmed inside the Stokes Adobe on Polk and Hartnell Streets in Monterey. A scene near the end was shot on the Cypress Grove trail at Point Lobos.

Star Trek IV: The Voyage Home

Story: The Earth is in chaos caused by powerful signals from an alien space probe. The Enterprise crew, while en route to Earth to face criminal charges (the result of their actions in Star Trek III: The Search for Spock), determine that the probe's signals are based on whale songs. Whales are extinct in the 23rd century, so they go back in time to the 20th century to retrieve some whales.

Scenery: Most of the scenes at the fictitious "Sausalito Cetacean Institute" were filmed at the Monterey Bay Aquarium. The Kelp Forest area was used as the viewing area for the whale tank. The exterior of the aquarium was made to appear as if it were in Sausalito by the addition of the San Francisco skyline placed in the background. (The skyline is cropped out for "pan and scan" videos, but it can be seen in "widescreen" videos.) Many scenes were filmed in San Francisco and the bay area.

A Summer Place

Story: Heavy-duty soap opera about two families, one with a teenage son, the other with a teenage daughter. The father of one and the mother of the other were once lovers, but ended up marrying others. The two families get together on an island one summer and family dysfunction ensues.

Scenery: Exterior scenes, intended to represent locations in the northeastern United States, were filmed entirely on the Monterey Peninsula. The "Pine Island Inn," where much of the story takes place, was a Victorian house in Pacific Grove on the northwest corner of Lighthouse Avenue and 17 Mile Drive. The exterior of Colton Hall in Monterey was used as the setting for a girl's boarding school. Other scenes filmed at Pescadero Point in Pebble Beach, Carmel Bay near Point Lobos, the Monterey airport, the Monterey train station. A very brief scene of Troy Donahue getting off a bus was shot on Cannery Row in front of the old San Xavier warehouse, near what is now the Monterey Plaza Hotel. The Frank Lloyd Wright house on Carmel Point was shown in several scenes, and edited with beach scenes filmed at Asilomar beach in Pacific Grove.

Also of local interest: The Victorian house mentioned above was the residence of William R. LaPorte, who was Mayor of Pacific Grove some years before the movie was made.

People:

- * Director: Delmer Daves

Sword in the Desert

Story: WWII action drama about an underground network transporting Jewish refugees from Europe to the Palestine coast.

Scenery: Beach scenes were filmed on Del Monte Beach in Monterey.

Also of local interest: About 300 local people were hired as extras to portray Jewish refugees landing on the beach in heavy surf. Angelo DiGirolamo played a Jewish soldier on the beach. He also served the director and several stars at his restaurant (Angelo's on Fisherman's Wharf). The director wanted to film the landings on the beach east of the Naval Postgraduate School but Angelo advised him that it was much safer closer to the wharves. The director took his advice, but even so, one boat overturned during filming. The director later thanked Angelo, saying that if he had done the landings where he had originally planned it would have been a disaster and would have ruined his reputation.

Turner & Hooch

Story: A neat-freak police detective takes into his home the only witness to a murder - an ugly, sloppy dog.

Scenery: Most of the exterior scenes were filmed in Pacific Grove. The bank building at the southwest corner of Lighthouse and Forest Avenues was used to represent city hall of the town called "Cypress Grove." The office building on the opposite corner was used as a church. Other scenes were shot along the Ocean View Boulevard and in residential areas.

Also of local interest: Originally the filmmakers planned to shoot in Carmel. Henry Winkler, one of the producers, spoke to an assembly of students at Carmel High School looking for extras. However, the city placed too many restrictions of filming, so Pacific Grove was chosen instead.

Vertigo

Story: A suspense thriller about a retired San Francisco police detective who suffers from a fear of heights. An old friend hires him to tail his wife to determine why her mood has suddenly changed.

Scenery: One scene was shot at Cypress Point in Pebble Beach. Several scenes, including the film's climax, were filmed nearby in San Juan Bautista, in and around the mission. The mission's tower, which plays an important role in the story, was painted in by matte artists at the studio. The mission does not have a tower. Two scenes feature Jimmy Stewart and Kim Novak driving on Highway 101 through the eucalyptus grove southwest of San Juan Bautista. Supposedly they are driving from San Francisco, but they are traveling in the wrong direction-from Monterey. Many scenes were filmed in San Francisco.

People:

Appendix

Movies removed from the original list

These movies were on the original list compiled in the 1980s by Joe Graziano (aka Professor Toro) of the Monterey Herald. After viewing these movies I have removed them from the list because they do not contain any locally filmed scenes after all.

Four Daughters

A 1938 soap opera about a widowed father helping his daughters through their early romantic lives. It was remade the following year with the same cast as Daughters Courageous. According to the Monterey County Film Commission website, it contained scenes filmed in front of Colton Hall in Monterey. However, most of the film was shot on studio sets. There were only two location scenes. One involved a car crash on a country road. The other was a train station surrounded by eucalyptus trees. These scenes were clearly shot somewhere in California, but apparently not on the Monterey Peninsula. I have not yet seen the 1939 remake Daughters Courageous, which remains on the list, but it is possible someone got the two films confused.

Harry and the Hendersons

This 1987 movie involves a family in the Pacific Northwest which adopts a Bigfoot creature. Supposedly it contains some background scenes filmed on the Monterey Peninsula. However, it was actually shot entirely in Washington state. There was also a TV series that was based on the movie, which ran from 1991-1993. It is possible that portions of a TV episode were filmed here and somewhere along the way to the list it got confused with the movie of the same name.

Shock

A 1946 B-grade thriller about a woman who witnesses a murder. The psychiatrist who committed the crime tries to silence her with drugs and hypnosis. The only location shots, which are very brief, were shot in San Francisco. The dialog does make several references to Carmel and Point Lobos, and the writer was obviously familiar with the area. There are also a couple of scenes involving the interior of a cottage in Carmel, but it was shot on a Hollywood set, not in Carmel itself, so unfortunately it doesn't quite count. We can give this one an honorable mention, though.

They Drive By Night

This 1940 film stars Humphrey Bogart and George Raft as truck drivers. According to the original list, the movie contained a scene hauling fish from Monterey's municipal wharf. After viewing the film, however, I found the scene was shot on a pier in San Francisco, not Monterey.

To Eternity, but not From Here

*The following was originally published online in Mr. Toy's Mental Notes on May 11, 2011.

Perhaps the most significant on-screen kissing scene was when Snoopy smacked Lucy straight on the lips, causing her to run around screaming for disinfectant. But for some reason the scene with Burt Lancaster and Deborah Kerr, lying on a sandy beach as a wave washes over their entwined bodies, gets all the attention. Go figure.

The movie was 1953s From Here to Eternity which has long been on the official list of movies containing scenes shot on or near the Monterey Peninsula. It's a melodramatic depiction of the lives of soldiers and women in Hawaii just prior to the bombing of Pearl Harbor.

Interestingly, residents of Oahu and residents of Monterey County both lay claim to the beach where the kissing scene was filmed. Hawaiians proudly promote Halona Cove on the southeast side of Oahu as "Eternity Beach" because they say the scene was shot right there. Monterey County residents like to boast that the Hawaiians are mistaken because Pfeiffer Beach (some say Garrapata Beach) in Big Sur was the site of the illicit tryst.

How can that be?

An article in the Spring/Summer 2005 issue of Carmel Magazine explained that the scene was originally filmed in Hawaii, but the director didn't like the lighting and he decided to re-shoot the scene. It was too expensive to return to Oahu so he chose a much shorter trip to Big Sur where the final version of the scene was put in the can. "It happened here, in Big Sur" the article emphatically proclaimed.

Unfortunately, Carmel Magazine was wrong, and I have proof. Take a look at these two video stills:

Exhibit A: Deborah Kerr in From Here To Eternity.

Exhibit B: Halona Cove in Hawaii

Notice the rock formation just above Deborah Kerr's head. Although it is kind of fuzzy, it is clearly a match for the rock in the upper right of the lower photo. Note the slope is steeper on the right side than the left side, and the points on the left side are visible in both. The rock shows up twice in the movie scene, proving unmistakably that the scene was shot in Hawaii, not Big Sur.

Other portions of the scene, which I am unable to show here, clearly show a guardrail on the cliff above the beach, indicating the presence of a road very close by. Google satellite maps show a road directly above Halona Cove. Pfeiffer Beach, however, has no roads above it, and the only road leading to it stops well short of the beach. Furthermore, the rocks in the scene do not quite resemble the craggy granite found on the Monterey County coastline.

There may very well have been some production activity related to the movie in Big Sur. Most legends contain some element of truth. Doug Lumsden of Monterey Movie Tours said in a recent e-mail:

“There are oldtimers in Big Sur who swear they saw Burt Lancaster and Deborah Kerr on the beach with the entire film crew for two days. I don't think there's any question that some sort of filming was done for that scene in our area, but we'll probably never know the entire story. All the principals have died and the real answer will probably never be known.”

A few possibilities come to mind. Perhaps the entire scene was re-shot in Big Sur, but the director ultimately decided the Hawaiian footage worked best after all. Or maybe portions of footage shot in Big Sur were edited in with the Hawaiian footage to make a complete scene. Or perhaps Big Sur was used to make some publicity shots that were never intended to be in the film itself. At this point we can only speculate.

Since there is still reason to believe that something between Here and Eternity happened on Monterey County shores, we'll keep the movie on our list for now. It's only fair, because another movie on the list, 1987's Blind Date also had scenes shot in our area that never made the final cut.

But I hereby declare that our local myth, which says the famous beach kissing scene as shown on-screen was really shot in Big Sur, is officially BUSTED!

Technical notes

For helping you decipher the detailed film listings.

N/A means the information is not available.

People listed in italics either live or once lived on the Monterey Peninsula.

Year indicates the year the movie was released in theaters, not the year of filming.

Film is 35mm unless otherwise noted or listed as n/a.

* B&W means the movie was filmed in black & white.

* Color refers to standard color movie film, usually Eastmancolor. Studio tradenames, if any, for the Eastmancolor process are listed in parenthesis (Warnercolor, DeLuxe, or Metrocolor). Older Eastmancolor negatives have been known to fade badly after as little as 10 years.

* Technicolor is listed as a separate process because it uses three black and white negatives filmed through three primary-color filters. When it is printed, the three negatives are combined by passing light through three color filters again to create a color image in the final print. Since black and white film is virtually immune to fading, perfect Technicolor prints can, theoretically, be made indefinitely from the same negatives. Unfortunately the Technicolor process is no longer used for new films.

Aspect ratio refers to the shape of the picture, specifically the proportions of the width in relation to the height. This can be a confusing subject because a wide variety of film and TV formats have been used over the decades. Since TV screens don't always match movie formats, it is helpful to understand how aspect ratios work so that you can view movies as they were intended to be seen.

Prior to 1953, most movies were made with an aspect ratio of approximately 1.37 to 1 (usually written 1.37:1), meaning that the picture was 1.37 times as wide as it was tall. This is almost identical to old style (standard definition) TV screen, which is 1.33:1. In 1953 movie makers and theaters began converting to various widescreen formats, primarily to lure viewers away from their new TV sets.

Here's a rundown of the most common aspect ratio formats that have been used over the last century or so, followed by a handy diagram:

* 1.33:1 / 1.37:1 - The standard prior to 1953. Silent films were filmed at 1.33:1. It was changed to 1.37:1 when sound was introduced and the format needed to be modified slightly to accommodate the soundtrack. Since the difference between 1.33 and 1.37 is so slight, most people just say 1.33:1 to keep it simple. Because 1.33:1 film was the standard of the day, it was naturally adopted as the format for old style (standard definition) TV screens as well. The television and video industries call it 4x3.

* 1.66:1 – This is a common format for foreign films. It was also used in the 1950s under trade names such as VistaVision, which could be cropped vertically and shown in theaters at 1:85:1 (preferred) or go as wide as 2:1. They can usually be safely cropped horizontally and shown at 1.33:1.

* 1.78:1 – This is the standard format for high-definition television (HDTV). The video industry uses the term 16x9, but it's the exact same thing ($16 \div 9 = 1.78$). This shape is based on a mathematical formula that determined it to be the best compromise for displaying all movie and TV formats.

* 1.85:1 - This has been one of the two most common formats in use since the mid 1950s. It is sometimes called a “flat” format because the image is not compressed as it is with the other most common widescreen format (2.35:1). Instead, the standard 1.33:1 frame is simply masked with black bars at the top and bottom. Often the film is still shot and printed at 1.33:1 and masked in the theater's projector.

* 2.2:1 - The most common format for 70mm films. The most familiar trade names for this format are Todd-AO and Super Panavision.

* 2.35:1 - Introduced in 1953, this format is known by numerous trade names, the most familiar being Cinemascope and Panavision. This system compresses a widescreen image into a 1.33:1 frame. The image looks squished on the film itself. A special “anamorphic” lens is used on the projector to stretch the image to its intended proportions. Some early Cinemascope films went as wide as 2.55:1. It's the most common format for major blockbusters, and most of the big musicals of the '50s and '60s. The format is often called "scope" in the movie industry.

Now pay close attention, because this is where it gets confusing. In the aspect ratios listed above, the number 1 always represents the height of the screen, while the width is measured as multiples of 1. This makes for easy comparisons. For example, it is plain to anyone that 2.35:1 is wider than 1.85:1 because 2.35 is a larger number than 1.85. This is how the motion picture industry makes aspect ratios nice and simple.

Unfortunately, the video industry decided to make a mess of this system by using whole numbers to represent screen proportions instead of fractions. So with old style TVs they don't call it 1.33:1, they call it 4x3. When widescreen high-definition TV came into being, they decided to continue their madness and call the new shape 16x9. This makes it virtually impossible for the average consumer like yourself to make any meaningful comparison between formats without a calculator in hand.

Fortunately, there is a simple trick to thwart this diabolical plot against innocent TV viewers. If you've read this far, you already know that a 4x3 TV screen has an aspect ratio of 1.33:1. So if you have an older TV, whenever you see the expression 4x3 you just think 1.33:1. And if you have a 16x9 widescreen HDTV? That translates into 1.78:1. Just substitute that whenever you see 16x9 and you can make easy comparisons with any movie format.

But, you are probably asking, how do we get all those different shapes to fit my TV screen? Well, first of all it depends on whether you have an older 1.33:1 (4x3) TV or a widescreen 1.78:1 (16x9) TV.

When viewing widescreen films on older televisions, they are often severely cropped to fit the TV screen. Films shot in the 2.35:1 "scope" format lose almost half the picture this way. Editors try to be selective, but even then important details get lost. Sometimes actors disappear from the scene altogether. Movies shot at 1:85:1 lose about 25% of the image, which isn't quite so bad. The good news is that movies made before 1953 fit old TV screens perfectly. And there's more good news. Most DVD movies come in "widescreen" or "letterbox" format, presenting the full image, but leaving blank spaces at the top and bottom of the screen.

Newer widescreen TVs complicate the issue somewhat, but generally provide a better fit. In fact, movies shot at 1.85:1 fit a 1.78:1 widescreen TV almost perfectly. There's a slight difference, but not enough for anyone to care. "Scope" (2.35:1) movies, however, must still be "letterboxed" with blank spaces at the top and bottom of the screen to see the full picture. Or they may be cropped, losing about 25% of the picture to fit the screen.

At the other end of the spectrum older 1.33:1 movies, and most TV shows made before 2009, aren't wide enough to fit a widescreen TV. When viewed properly, you will see blank spaces on each side of the screen. Some people don't like that. After all, they bought this widescreen TV and they want to use every square inch of it! So they find the button on the remote that controls the aspect ratio and force it to fit. But the result is always a distorted picture. Either they cut off the top and bottom of the picture, or they stretch it out and make everyone look fat. Please, don't do that.

Most DVD and Blu-Ray discs indicate the aspect ratio on the package. If the aspect ratio is wider than your TV screen, it is perfectly acceptable to have black space at the top and bottom of your screen so you can see the full image. Similarly, if the picture has a narrower shape, you should see blank space on each side. It is better to see the complete, undistorted picture than to fill the screen.

Sound is also rather complicated. A variety of formats have evolved over the years, but the capabilities of individual theaters and home audio systems varies greatly. The actual presentation depends entirely on what equipment is available.

Prior to the late 1920s, movies didn't even have a soundtrack. However, these so-called "silent" films were never really silent. They were intended to be accompanied by live music. In larger theaters this might involve a full orchestra. Small town theaters usually had only a piano, occasionally with a violinist alongside. However, most theaters of the silent era were equipped with a theater organ, which enabled a single musician to have a full range of instruments, including percussion and sound effects, at his or her fingertips. The better quality videos of silent films feature an organ or orchestral soundtrack composed specially for the film and recorded in stereo. Beware of cheap silent videos, for they typically insert generic old-timey music that is not synchronized with the action on the screen, and you may hear the same music repeat every few minutes.

Experiments in sound actually began as early as 1896 when a presentation was made in Berlin using phonographic discs synchronized with the film. Over the next 30 years a number of short films and newsreels were made with sound, but none had widespread exhibition. Sound finally become commercially viable in 1927 when Warner Bros. introduced a sound on disc system called Vitaphone for the first "talkies." The following year Fox studios offered the first "sound on film" process which they called Movietone. Soon after, the Warners abandoned the disc format in favor of sound on film. By the middle of 1930 silent films had been completely phased out.

Stereo sound first came along in 1935 when the silent film Napoleon (1927) was reissued with a new soundtrack for a special engagement in Paris. Films with stereo sound were produced in the U.S. beginning in 1940. "Stereo" in a film listing refers to basic two-channel stereo.

Disney Studios developed the first "surround" stereo in 1941 for Fantasia, but Fantasound, as the system was called, was installed in only a handful of theaters. In the mid 1970s Dolby Laboratories developed an economical method of encoding four channels of stereo information onto a standard two-channel stereo soundtrack. Theaters equipped with special decoders could present Dolby Stereo offering right, left, center and surround channels with relative ease. A later version, Dolby SR offers greater sound clarity, less noise, and a wider frequency range.

Most theaters now offer digital sound with as many as six channels. There are two competing and incompatible formats, Dolby Digital and DTS. Much like the 1927 Vitaphone process, DTS uses a CD which is synchronized with the film. Dolby Digital is a separate soundtrack on the film itself, squeezed into the space between sprocket holes!

Many "home theater" sound systems are now available at modest cost which bring surround formats into your living room. A Dolby Pro-Logic system is essentially the original four-channel Dolby Stereo, modified slightly to accommodate the limitations of a home system. Dolby Stereo is encoded on most Hi-Fi stereo video tapes, so if you still have some VHS tapes in your video collection you can enjoy your movies in surround sound. Nowadays, 5.1 channel Dolby Digital sound is provided on most DVD and Blu-Ray discs for use with the appropriate home systems, but they will also work with a Dolby Pro-Logic system as well. If you just have a standard two-channel stereo system, you can still enjoy stereo sound with your movies, just not the surround effects.

Running time is for the original theatrical release. Some videos (sometimes called the "director's cut") may contain added scenes that weren't shown in theaters, so some versions may have longer running times than those shown here. Some old movies may have had portions lost to film decay and may run somewhat shorter than the original.

MPAA ratings are determined by the Motion Picture Association of America. They are intended as guidelines to help parents determine which movies are appropriate for children of various ages. MPAA ratings were first adopted in November 1968. Movies released prior to that date do not have MPAA ratings. See www.mpa.org for further information.
